MONEY WISE

Smart finance, spicy romance

Love may be in the air, but couples should settle their money issues before saying 'I do'

KEERTHI SANAGASETTI

This time around every year, couples This time around every year, coupra-try to take the plunge. But money mat-ters often get relegated to the back seat when such life-changing decisions are made. Not discussing financial affairs beforehand can, however, spark fights beforehand can, however, spark fights eventually. Also, if you have plans to ask someone out, know the few financial aspects you should decide on before you get hitched.

Firstly, be sure of each other's ex-isting financial liabilities. Next, decide on whether you would want to divide the EMI from here on or continue to bear the burden solely. Besides, you can set the tone for your debt preferences going forward. While some may be willing to break the bank for certain experi-ences, for their money-pinching partners this might seem like a nightmare. This is where it would be ideal to set goals as a couple. Deciding about the kind of purchases you would want to take on debt for can help avoid conflicts.

Sharing expenses
With financial independence popularity, the question no longer hinges around whether or not to share the expenses. The new-age strife is now more often around how well to split the bills. It would be unjust to divide the bills equally in circumstances where you two earn unequal incomes.

Not discussing financial affairs beforehand can lead to fights eventually you two earn unequal incomes.

Having an equitable divide in such cases may be more ideal.
That is, household expenses can, for instance, be split in proportion to the income of each partner.
Else, you can each pay off certain bills and save the rest for the other partner.

It is also fine if either partner wants to chip in only a certain amount into the household kitty and retain the rest of their income for other personal needs as the case may be.

Coming to a consensus on all of these pain points upfront can keep the two of you away from a lot of unpleasantness later. Whatever your ideal way of splitting the bills is, opening a joint bank acount, might come in handy for both of you.

For this, you can continue maintaining your individual bank accounts and transfer (through an auto-sweep facility) only the agreed amounts to the joint account. In this way you can continue to and save the rest for the other partner.

the agreed amounts to the joint ac-count. In this way you can continue to enjoy your financial independence in true letter and spirit. Also, you must try to set clear bound-aries on what expenses would be split among the two of you. This is a smart strategy, which will help keep sore points at bay, in the future.

It would be wise to be open and state clearly one's choice about financially supporting their family. While one need not seek permission from the other partner for spending on their own family's needs, it would be wise to not let your couple financial goals take a toll either. Each partner can hence be explicit about the funds they wish to earmark regularly for one's own family.

Savings
In most cases, since opposites often attract, couples do not often have the same spending habits. Their economic backgrounds, current level of income and the lifestyle they choose to settle-in for, all play important roles in deciding their saving habits.

It would hence be pragmatic to keep each other in the know of your current spending and saving practices and each other in the know of your current spending and saving practices and goals you foresee for the two of you. Ask-ing and sharing your financial goals with your partners also has its benefits.

Not only do you get a helping hand by way of extra funds, but you also get to have someone to keep a check on your frivolous spending— just so you can stick to your financial resolutions

Insurance

insurance
Another important aspect to enquire upfront would be about your partner's existing insurance cover. If you take loans, you need to provide for them in case of your absence and also not burden your spouse unnecessarity. Ditto It you plan to raise a family, if either part-ner does not have an existing life cover, you can consider buying a joint policy. The premium amount is usually lower in joint life plans compared to individuals taking two separate plans, though benefits remain the same under both cases.

You must increase your cover as and when your income levels, liabilities and expenses rise. You can also consider a family floater policy instead of individual health plans.

Owning a house means many things – a roof over your head, an asset whose value may increase over time and a legacy that you can pass on to your near and dear ones. You can transfer the ownership of your property to your fam-ily by different ways. Here's what you should know.

As per Transfer of Property Act 1882, a property is said to be gifted only if it is transferred voluntarily. Also, a gift deed must be unconditional.

No. an transfer property as gift to your family or outside of your family. Once a gift deed is executed, it is irrevocable and the transfer of ownership is immediate. Further, if you transfer property via gift deed to close family spouse, children, parents, sister or browther and grandbarents, it is exheured. spouse, children, parents, socce brother and grandparents, it is ex brother and grandparents, it is ex-empt from taxes. But gifts outside of family attracttax. That is, for any property with stamp duty value greater than Rs 50,000, tax is levied on the stamp duty value. It is considered to be income from other sources and is subject to taxation based on the tax slabs ation based on the tax slabs. When a property is transferred as a gift, it attracts stamp duty and registration charges. These costs vary with different States and some in fact, provide concession depending on the relationship. You can't gift a jointly-held property. Further, keep in mind that, gifts in India generally fall under the scrutiny of the tax department and, therefore, it is advisable to not only to maintain visable to not only to maintain documentation but also register the gift deed.

A property can be transferred through a Will as well. But the execution of the Will takes place only after the owner's lifetime.

Property transfer under a Will is similar to that of a gift deed. However, unlike a gift deed where the ownership takes immediate effect and is irrevocable, a Will can be reand is irrevocable, a Will can be re-voked or replaced any number of times during the lifetime of the person drawing it up. A Will need not be registered, but it is advis-able to do so. Property received under a Will is tax-exempt, even for non-relat-ives. Raghvendra Nath, Managing Director, Ladderup Wealth Man-agement, says: "If the transfer is within the family it is always better to go with Will as inheritance doesn't attract tax. Alternatively, if it is simply a question of conveni-ence, say, between husband and wife or father and son, then trans-fer through gift deed makes sense."

A property transfer by way of Will is considered complete only Will is considered comp after the death of the after the death of the property owner. However, after the death the successors) needs to apply to the concerned civil authorities with the copy of the Will, succes-sion certificate and death certific-ate for completing the property transfer. Unlike other modes, a transfer through Will may take

Whether a property is relinquished with or without any consideration, stamp duty and registration charges apply at the time of registration but only on the portion that has been relinquished or released. This deed is used in the absence of Will where beneficiaries inherit the property equally. Another way to transfer is through partition deed where the property is owned jointly by family members. Post the execution of a partition deed, each member becomes an independent owner of higher share and is legally free to sell, rent or gift the asset. It is mandatory to register a partition deed and stamp duty and registration charges applies at the time of registration. However, a partition deed doesn't involve payment of any consideration for the property, therefore, there is no tax. Both relinquishment and partition deeds are irrovocable. relinquishment and partition deeds are irrevocable.
